QUEUES DROP

Many Pigtailed Shed In Honolulu.

Chinese Youth Emulates Example of Leung Chi-tso Whose Head The Dowager Seeks.

If the dream of certain Chinese residents of Honolulu comes true there will be a queueless Celestial population here. A big fight is to be made for the adoption of the American culture. The dropping of the braid is to be the sign of progress; the wearing of one's hair "à la même Melicman" is to be considered the mark of enlightenment, and of freedom from tradition's chains.

Coupled with the casting away of the picturesque pigtail comes the donning of the white man's garb. It is not merely the fad of a few enthusiasts, but a determined effort by shrewd leaders of the younger generation to raise the flag of resistance to the present Chinese government. It is troubling China's representatives here mightily. In the upper circles of officialdom it is spoken of only in whispers.

Ask those who look after the interests of the Tartar Dowager Queen in Hawaii and they will tell you there is nothing in the "queue business," or they will make light of the facts. May be they fear that recognizing the revolt against the Manchu style of hair-dressing might swell it. Certain it is that each day in Honolulu, as well as in other parts of Hawaii, sees fewer braids on Chinese heads and more European coats upon their backs.

Only yesterday a prominent householder stared in astonishment at his Chinese "boy" when the latter served the breakfast minus his queue. Where once had been a handsome "tail" twined with bright silk was a shock head of hair whose owner's vigorous attempts to part it in the middle had made it much like a long-used shoe-brush.

"For heaven's sake, Ah Sing," exclaimed the amazed and not over-pleased employer, "what have you done to yourself?"

Ah Sing was mightily delighted. He ran his fingers through his hair and replied, "Me cuttee off allee samee littee bit. China boy allee makee Melicman headee. More better China longee."

Gone with his braid were his flowing trousers and brilliant blouse and in their stead were coat, vest and trousers of approved Honolulu fashion. The householder did not peer further into the cause for the change. If he had he would have learned that Ah Sing was one of eleven young men of his own age who sacrificed their peculiar race-badges the night before. They had gathered in a barber shop and talked advancement to one another as the queues dropped. The step had been debated long and had been taken under a unanimous agreement.

Ah Sing's employer might have found, too, that the hand of Leung Chi-tso was the one that moved the scissors. Not that the Reformer with a price of $65,000 on his head had actually piled the sacrificial shears, but that it was his philosophy that was quoted while the pigtailed fell, and his political code that urged on the youths to the shearing.

Leung Chi-tso, who so barely escaped the vengeance of the empress mother, wears no queue. He lost his between a night and day and thereby saved his head. Now he preaches the doctrine of "tailless" pates and American clothes. The clever Leung knows that the queue is the symbol of servitude to the Manchu dynasty; that its absence makes a Chinese the object of suspicion in China; that the more queues gone the greater is the apparent strength of the party he seeks to guide in its battle for reform and for modern laws and customs.

Question any Chinese storekeeper or tailor. He will answer you that within a few weeks—since Leung Chi-tso took up his home here—there has been a startling discarding of Chinese dress by the youths of the servant and middle class. He may not give you the right reason for this innovation, and may lay it to economy or the demands of competition in labor.

He is wrong. Leung Chi-tso is the glass of fashion and the model for the hustling, ambitious Chinese in Hawaii.

Within a few days the former adviser to the deposed Emperor will sail for the other islands. He will make a thorough visit to every place that holds men of his nation, and wherever they are will deliver to them his message of opposition to the things that are in China. His followers here say that he has with him 5,000 of the 7,000 Chinese in Honolulu already.

The old men of the Flowery Kingdom see evil in Leung Chi-tso's preachments. So do the old men here. They want no changes. The queueless head is like the Japanese's, and he is abomination to the powers that be in China. They see visions of revolution in the shedding of the blouse and loose nether garment. But Leung Chi-tso has no care for what they want, and Hawaii's Celestial youth seems with him.

Indigent Consumptives.

Editor Advertiser: The note on the editorial page of your issue of the 20th inst. referring to a home for indigent consumptives appeals to us all, but is there not an obligation lying with the Port Physician to see that no such consumptives, indigent or otherwise, are allowed to land here? Taking care of our local indigents is task enough, but a number of cases of consumptives dying lately under exceptionally distressing circumstances are directly traceable to foreign sources. Not only did they arrive diseased, but with finances so low that they immediately became charges of charitably inclined residents.
